16.70 Investigations in acute rheumatic fever

Evidence of a systemic illness

- Leucocytosis, raised erythrocyte sedimentation rate and C-reactive protein

Evidence of preceding streptococcal infection

- Throat swab culture: group A  $\beta$  haemolytic streptococci (also from family members and contacts)
- Antistreptolysin O antibodies (ASO titres): rising titres, or levels of >200 U (adults) or >300 U (children)

Evidence of carditis

- Chest X-ray: cardiomegaly, pulmonary congestion
- ECG: first- and second-degree atrioventricular block, features of pericarditis; T-wave inversion; reduction in QRS voltage
- Echocardiography: cardiac dilation and valve abnormalities does not respond to medical treatment, valve replacement may be necessary and is often associated with a dramatic decline in rheumatic activity. Occasionally, AV block may occur but is seldom progressive and usually resolves spontaneously. Plainly, pacemaker insertion may be required.

Antibiotics

A single dose of benzathine benzylpenicillin (12 million U IM) or oral phenoxymethylpenicillin (250 mg 4 times daily for 10 days) should be given on diagnosis to eliminate any residual streptococcal infection. If the patient is penicillin-allergic, erythromycin or a cephalosporin can be used. Patients are susceptible to further attacks of rheumatic fever if another streptococcal infection occurs.

Prophylaxis

Patients with a history of acute rheumatic fever should be given prophylactic penicillin to prevent further attacks. The aim is to prevent further attacks of acute rheumatic fever and thus prevent the development of chronic rheumatic heart disease.
