Sebacaceous cyst

Epidermoid cysts are the most common cutaneous cysts and Epidermoid cysts are derived from the follicular infundibulum. Filled with keratin material.

Generally, these cysts are the result of plugging of the follicular orifice.

The cyst communicates with the surface of the skin through a keratin-filled orifice.

Epidermoid cysts are lined with stratified squamous epithelium that leads to an accumulation of keratin within the subepithelial layer of dermis.

Epidermoid cysts are lined with stratified squamous epithelium that leads to an accumulation of keratin within the subepithelial layer of dermis.

Generally, the cysts are asymptomatic until they rupture.

When the cyst ruptures, an inflammatory reaction occurs from the displacement of keratin and debris into the dermis and surrounding tissue.

Recently ultraviolet (UV) light and infection with the human papillomavirus (HPV) have been implicated in causing epidermoid cysts.

History and Physical

Physical examination generally reveals a 0.5 cm to several centimeters of soft, non-fluctuant, compressible mass.

A central, dark comedone opening (punctum) is often described.

Epidermoid cysts are usually asymptomatic.

however, if ruptured it may closely resemble a furuncle with tenderness to palpation, erythema, and swelling.

A foul-smelling yellowish cheese-like material discharged from the skin may be described.

Epidermoid cysts can be found anywhere but are commonly on the face, neck, chest, upper back, scrotum, and genitalia.
